History Lesson...

Downshire Golf Course was built in 1973 and was named after the Marquis' of Downshire who owned the land from the 18th century.

The ground on which it was built once formed part of Windsor Forest, a Royal hunting ground dating back to the Middle Ages.

In 1350 King Edward III had a hunting lodge built in Easthampstead for his recreation.

Easthampstead Park Conference Centre which stands alongside the 16th fairway was a Royal Hunting lodge where Henry VII and his son Arthur, Prince of Wales arranged Arthur's marriage to Catherine of Aragon.

After the death of Arthur in 1502, Henry VIII married his brother's young widow but when his attention turned to Anne Boleyn, Catherine spent some years living at the Lodge awaiting news of King Henry's attempts to divorce her.

There are still some reminders of the Royal heritage including, the Royal hunting stables with clock tower which have now been converted into private homes. This white building is seen predominantly when playing the 12th and 13th holes. There is still chain link visible in one of the lower boughs of the ancient Oak on the 12th, where it is rumoured that the spoils of the hunt would be hung and the original ha-ha wall which would have kept deer and other grazing animals out of Easthampstead's formal gardens, still forms Downshire Golf Course's boundary on the 16th, although the probable 6ft drop has greatly diminished.

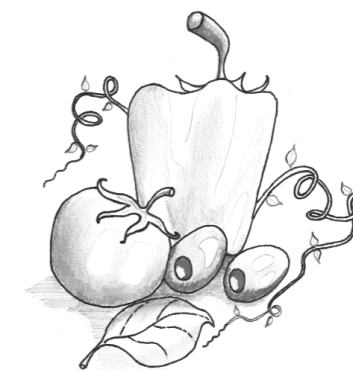

The ground that the golf course was built on was also bombed during the second World War by a JU88 German Bomber, the target was the Conference Centre, which at that point was being used as a temporary school given by the 7th Marquis of Downshire for the war effort.

Maybe it's quite apt then that Air Commodore Sir Louis Walter Dickens a bomber pilot during World War II was the Founder of Downshire Golf Course and served on the Joint course Committee for the Council.
He was also Downshire Golf Club's first President

The picture below dates prior to the course with the layout of the proposed holes and ponds although the course now operates the opposite way round.
